Customer Reviews

I am certainly a noob when it comes to cooking. Traditionally mom, and then spouse, have spoiled me. Never having to step into the kitchen other than having to help open a jar or slice onions, I often wished I could also cook. Only recently have I made my first few forays into the kitchen and self-taught myself to make some simple foods like Pizza and some basic pastries. Just last week, I took a recipe off the web and made a simple stir fry noodles dish - turned out a disaster! :(I have been banned from repeating this one! I have been waiting for a book like this - where the author has taken considerable steps to clearly describe each of the Asian spices and how they are used in the various dishes. She also suggests alternatives for them, so that if you cannot find the exact spice, you still have options to cook your dish. She starts the book with a great introduction to the various cultures and cuisines in Singapore, which sets the stage for the recipes to come, which are categorized logically into food groups like rice, vegetables, meat, seafood, etc. This is useful, as most meals in Singapore comprise of a mix of dishes from each of these categories. She also has helpful suggestions as to complimentary recipe combinations to make up meals. The recipes themselves are easily followed, especially for a beginner cook like me. I look forward to trying out all the recipes from here! Each recipe is preceded with a photo of the final result, so that we know what we are trying to accomplish. Even though each dish looks complex and flavorsome, Azlin has managed to list the steps in preparation and cooking in simple yet descriptive terms.
