In Finding the Worm, Mark Goldblatt revisits Julian àœTwerpà • Twerski and his friends and this outing is just as charming and thought-provoking as its predecessor, Twerp. This newest release is also a lot more poignant as thirteen year old Julian and his pals learn one of lifeà™s harshest lessons when one of their friends is diagnosed with cancer. Just before Christmas of 1969, Julian and his friends, Lonnie, Eric, Howie, Shlomo and Beverly are called to the guidance counselorà™s office where they learn that their close friend, Quentin, has been diagnosed with a brain tumor. The group is shaken by the news and although they are reassured that he will be fine, the kids are still worried. Julian takes his concerns to Rabbi Salzberg (whom they have nicknamed Magoo) who then uses Julianà™s bar mitzvah preparation to give him a few life lessons in addition to his haftarah instruction. While Julian is trying to make sense of Quentinà™s illness, the school principal accuses him of defacing a painting. Since he was suspended from school the previous year, Julianà™s punishment is to write a 200 word essay on good citizenship. His pleas of innocence fall on deaf ears, and Julian is soon locked in a battle of wills with the principal as week after week, he turns in essays that are about everything except good citizenship. Since he refuses to take the punishment seriously, the principal ups the ante and Julian knows he is beat, but it is not until Julian discovers the perpetratorà™s identity that he turns in an incredibly insightful essay that shows remarkable maturity. Despite their worries and Quentinà™s fragile health, Julian and the gang find plenty of time to enjoy being kids.

Julian Twerski figures something has gone horribly wrong when the entire 34th avenue gang --- Lonni, Eric, Beverly, Howard, Shlomo and himself --- are called down to the school counselorà™s office in the middle of morning. Miss Medina informs them that their friend Quentin --- who has been in and out of the hospital for the past month --- has a cancerous brain tumor and that they need to support him during this difficult time. This wasnà™t exactly the news Julian wanted to hear. He has his bar mitzvah in the next couple of months, is in the fast track at school and just wants Quentin to be fine so things can remain as normal as possible. Except, what is àœnormalà • anyway? Would normal be Julian being accused of defacing artwork and being forced to accept blame and write the principal an essay as punishment? Would normal be the girl you kind of like constantly asking to race against you in front of all your friends? If there is one thing Julian does know, however, normal certainly wouldnà™t be his friend Quentin possibly dying from a brain tumor. Julian is convinced Quentin will pull through despite the fact that his new àœnormalà • is fraught with uncertainty. What unfolds is coming-of-age story from author Mark Goldblatt, the author of TWERP, inspired by his own childhood. Julian constantly finds himself in situations where he needs to appease other people to keep his life on track, such as in the aforementioned ruined painting scenario and Beverlyâ€™s constant desire to race him. Will Julian ever make the principal happy and manage to stay ahead in school? Should Julian actually run like normal and show how much faster he is than her, or should he just let her win? Most importantly, what should Julian do about Quentin?
